Notes:

The Obituaries actually cover more of the counties surrounding Putnam County than just Jackson. A few of them are also from the Nashville Banner (no longer being published). The Cookeville Dispatch also ceased publication in 1994.

Copies of the CD containing the scanned images may be ordered from the TSLA, 403 7th Avenue North, Nashville, TN 37243. It includes a few pages of historical information not in this document.

INTRODUCTION

I purchased a copy of the CD described on the title page several years ago. I was amazed at the amount of information contained in the obituaries, and the dedicated effort required to amass them over a 21-year period. I was sure the information would be useful to those doing genealogical research, but I felt it would be more useful if it was in text format, not image. It would be easier to read, could be in perfect alphabetical order (the obituaries are arranged roughly alphabetically, but some are not), and the entries would be easier to use and could be easily copied to Internet reference sources. I do not wish to diminish the incredible work of Ms. Luttrell, but to add to it.

At the time I was not sure if the obituaries could be converted to text format, nor if I had the time to do so. With the arrival of the COVID pandemic, I suddenly found myself looking for something to keep me busy and came across the CD.

The CD contains 576 high quality 350 pixels-per-inch JPEG image scans of the scrapbook pages. All but a few introductory pages contain obituaries similar to those shown on the sample on the next page. With an average of 3-4 obituaries per page, there are over 2000 obituaries in the scrapbook. I have noted where a few could not be read by the OCR program, and where a very few of those could not be read by eye. These were marked on the CD as unreadable by the TSLA.

A few words about editing

I initially thought I would just present the obituaries exactly as they appeared in the newspapers, complete with the typos, misspellings, grammatical errors, missing text, etc. This seemed prudent, considering the difficulties surrounding the generation of them, both in the funeral homes and at the newspapers. However, I was an editor in a past life and quickly decided I could enhance the listings by editing them. I began by enclosing any additions or changes I made in brackets ([]), but that quickly became cumbersome. However, I did enclose death dates in brackets when I added them because the obituaries frequently do not include death dates, particularly the year. I looked those up on the Internet. Some clippings also have handwritten death dates, presumably by Ms. Luttrell. If those obituaries did not include a date, I used the handwritten ones, enclosed in parentheses. I did not check those dates against Internet sources. However, parentheses around dates do not always indicate they are the handwritten ones. The obituaries themselves sometimes included the dates in parentheses, but death years (only) in parentheses are almost always the handwritten ones.

In order to conserve space, I chose to ignore the multi-paragraph format of the obituaries and made almost all of them one paragraph. I also omitted content in a few instances I did not consider germane to the obituary, such as details of a traffic accident which resulted in the death.

There were also a few duplicates in the scrapbook. I chose the ones that seemed to have the most information; i.e., I did not include both obituaries in this document.

How this document was produced.*

I first opened each scrapbook page image in Adobe Photoshop, cropped each obituary from the page and saved them as a Photoshop files, using the person's names as filenames, last name first. I created a file folder for each letter of the alphabet (well, there weren't any X's) and filed them accordingly, hence the organization of this document (letters of the alphabet as chapter names). I did some editing on each one in Photoshop to straighten, lighten or darken them, and adjust contrast as needed. This was done to make them more acceptable to the next process, scanning each one with an Optical Character Recognition (OCR) program.

I used ABBY Software Ltd.'s FineReader OCR software to convert the images to editable text. However, it will not read Photoshop images, so I first converted them to Photoshop PDF files. Since these tend to be very large files in Photoshop, I next ran them through Adobe Acrobat to reduce the file sizes. I think FineReader did a decent job, considering the original print quality. Remember that these were printed in ink on newsprint paper which did not produce the crisp, sharp print quality we see today. And news print is almost always right justified, and is frequently spread or squeezed together to make a line fit the column width. All these can result in OCR read errors.

I used LibreOffice to create this document, and even though FineReader can save files in its format, I quickly realized doing so introduced a lot of formatting I didn't want. It was better to save them as plain text, without any formatting, even Tabs. Tabs are an issue because FineReader will sometimes read the wide fill spacing used by newspapers as Tabs. I also quickly learned the things that FineReader had the most problems with, and created a set of Search-and-Replace rules that helped greatly. But a few common reading issues had to be corrected manually. Because of the quality of the print and some of the images, FineReader sometimes had a hard time distinguishing commas and periods: commas were read as periods, and periods were sometimes missing. Others that caused reading problems were uppercase L's, and distinguishing between lowercase i's and l's. I only mention these so that readers will recognize any I failed to correct.

One last thing about FineReader: I learned that it can read files in batches; i.e., you don't have to read them one at a time. When you first start the program, it will open the file dialog asking you to select a file to be read. Cancel that and drag a list of files to the box on the left side of its window. It will treat the files as pages in a document, and save them as a single document when you Export.

Since the names are listed alphabetically, I initially did not feel an index was needed. However, I later realized it would be easier for readers to find the obituaries of interest by looking in an index instead of searching through pages.

*In case it might be helpful to those crazy enough to attempt this kind of thing.

Saturday. Burial will be in Hagerstown, Md. Dr. Willard died at his home in Cookeville on Friday morning [Jan. 25, 1985] after a lengthy illness.

He joined the faculty at Tennessee Tech in 1975 as chairman of the Dept. of Biology, a position he held until early 1984 when he gave up that post for health reasons. He continued to teach classes and supervise graduate students until his death. He was an associate professor of biology at Clemson University from 1965-1975, when he was a senior research investigator in population dynamics, ecosystems and radiation ecology. Willard was a research participant at Oak Ridge National Laboratory in 1974-75 and in the summers of 1958 and 1961. Dr. Willard was a research assistant in insect psychology at the University of Tennessee from 1960-1965, the year he earned the PhD in ecology and radiation biology at the institution. He was a research assistant at the Savannah River Project in Aiken, S.C., from 1958-1960 with the University of Georgia Institute of Ecology. He earned the M.S degree in ecology from the University of Georgia in 1960. His undergraduate education was at Hagerstown Junior College in Maryland and at the University of Georgia, where he received a bachelor's degree in wildlife management in 1957, and was a member of Phi Kappa Phi.

He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1950-1954 as a meteorological analyst in the Air Weather Service. Dr. Willard was a member of the Ecological Society of American, which granted him the prestigious designation of Certified Senior Ecologist in 1981, the Society of the Sigma Xi scientific research society, the American Institute of Biological Sciences, the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the Association of Southeastern Biologists, and the Tennessee Academy of Science. His primary research interests were in the area of population dynamics, ecosystems and radiation ecology, and he was well known for his work in ecological modeling. He was in the forefront of research in radiation biology while working at Oak Ridge and Savannah River laboratories. "He was an imaginative scientist," said colleague S.K. Ballal, a Tech biology professor. "He could eliminate the debris and find the Jewel in a scientific project very quickly."
